Connecting with your practice? What's Missing

When I look around the room, I see a lot of enthusiasm!

I have hear a lot of people who are very into this new age way of thinking. So what is missing?

As a Reiki student of 16 years you would think that I would light up with the news of so many Reiki presentations, so what*s missing?.

I suppose it could be a little bit of ego, competition, but in truth with what I have learned of the many paths of Reiki, I hurt for Reiki!!!

REIKI is a hands on practice, it is a remembering, an acknowledging of a relationship with universal life force energy. Reiki is something that is remembered from inside. It is not learned from the outside.

There are many enthusiastic teachers out there wanting to share their gift of Reiki, and yet when they speak of it they sound and feel so separate from it. It sounds like something they call for from outside them selves. Where is the connection??

Where is the experience??

Where is the relationship??

There are a lot of Reiki Masters standing up and making it very first and foremost known that they themselves are a Reiki master, yet if Mastery is of the self when you truly own this entitlement there is no obligation to the ego for recognition. The pleasure of your own experience is enough to hold in your heart vs. shouting it to the universe.

I believe a true master is recognized in a silent grace. There is no need for the out side understanding of experience level because it is so obviously expressed in the way that they live.

People can know many many things, the key is to put it into practice into your own life first and your world second.
A student is someone that does a thousand things once, a master is someone that does one thing a thousand times."

Another way of looking at it is this.....

It's like someone having a moment of experience that is awe inspiring to them. A sun set , a sun rise, a beautiful baby, a life changing experience.

One person will take this awe inspiring moment and they will want to share it with their world. They want their loved ones their friends their students to see to reach to have this Aha moment.

*They will want it so badly for their world that they will devote themselves to sharing this experience with the world.

So what's missing?

I believe that a single aha moment can be experienced infinitely, and is seen by the spark in their eye, the grace of their walk, the warmth of their personality. They look like they have a special secret that lights them up from the inside out.

Such energy can be spoken with only action, with being in it, & owning it. These experiences can not be shared through words, they can only be shared through experience and a partnering with your practice.
(Then the world will want what you have)

What's Missing? The relationship, The personal partnering to your practice.
